This talk will review some of the contributions Dick Askey made to the debate on how to improve mathematics education in the US. One of his lasting contributions was to help found, and later to host, the MathEd discussion group, whose membership included a significant number of mathematicians seriously working on mathematics education, as well as some notable mathematics education researchers, and some excellent teachers. Dick also participated in a number of significant debates and events, and some examples will be discussed. (Received September 14, 2020)
